Exquisitely Dainty Frock

By La Raconteuse.

The exquisite daintiness of this charming frock is the appealing note, for it is one layer after another of delicate silk net with a very fine cord finish. The odd puffed puff and simple draped girdle is embroidered with tiny beads, which lend a most unusual effect. The simplicity of the draped bodice and bell sleeves is most fascinating.

Fetching "Furs" From Old Plumes

Scarfs, Muffs and Hats Edged With Fronds Are Stunning.

The French are past masters of the art of utilizing "leftovers." This is no more true of their culinary ability than it is of their skill in adapting odds and ends of choice materials to the changes in mode. Consequently, when one considers the long willow plume, so recently worn and now so utterly a style of the past, one suspects that the French have found a way of utilizing it to advantage in a revised form. And as a matter of fact, it has reappeared this season, divided up into feather edgings and fringes, and used as an adornment for scarfs, evening dresses, elongated tunics and overalls, and a beautiful glory on hats. And a most beautiful trimming it proves to be, for evening gowns and dancing scarfs, as it floats like the spray on the crest of the wave with each motion of the wearer.

A very smart way is to use part of the plume for the hat and the other for a neck ruche, and a little more may be added for a between-season muff similar in material to the hat. If a small ornament is desired, as for one of the velvet tam-tous, or other small hat, the stem of the plume is wound in a circle about a bit of stiffening well wired, and sewn to it. The lower fronds are allowed to float at will over the toque, but the upper ones are drawn down and fastened over the stem with silk the same tone, so that they form a ball. Then the stiffening is placed at the left side, or at the back and sewn on to the toque.

The ruffle for the throat is made on a collar of satin lined with stiffening. The plume is attached by the stem, and covered by velvet ribbon the color of the satin; this also forms the ribbon ties. With it may be carried a small shirred ruff of satin or taffeta, according to the material of the toque and the ruffle lining. The ends of the muffs are bound with a roll of velvet, which covers where the willow is sewn on, and the muffs are shirred three rows in the center, at either side and at the ends.

As a rule the plumes will be found on examination to be what are called "made plumes"—that is, two or three stems are fastened together, although appearing as only one—and they are easily separated. This has the advantage that, when used as trimming, it is not too heavy; and where much is required, as on the bottom of a skirt, the single stems are sufficient, and a long strip may be made from one willow.

Another charming set is of the popular deep blue satin with black feathers. The little toque has the willow attached all around the crown and the fronds held up by a narrow band of silver ribbon with a jaunty bow at the side. This is sure to be attractive, as the soft lines of the fronds remove the severe and trying line of the new small hats. The fronds are arranged to be a little longer in the back and have the fronds on both sides of the stem, which is concealed under the edge of the toque. The muffs of satin is the popular heart shape, and quite small, with a fringe of willow to outline the base and the fastening covered with a silver ribbon as on the toque. The scarf as well as the muffs is lined with a contrasting color, such as white or cherry, and has the pointed heart-shaped ends with the fringe of willow, but the silver ribbon runs underneath and shows only at intervals as the fronds separate. Other things may be used in the place of the silver ribbon, such as bands of jet or steel beads, or a moire ribbon.

Willow finished the edge of a square collar in the back, and decorates the wrist of the long sleeve. It also appears on the gowns and on negligees. The white fronds may be washed with a fine laundry soap and tepid water and dried in the sun and air. Many of the new hats have small willow fronds floating over the brim. An imported sailor of deep blue satin had a crown of willow radiating from the center, with only the underneath fronds caught to the hat.

If one does not care to make such things at home, any milliner can carry out the ideas. Plumes which are bedraggled and soiled may be freshened by cleansing and dyeing.

Tea Table Talks

May De Witt Talmage.

COMPARISON IS A RIFT IN THE LUTE.

With a sigh of satisfaction they seated themselves in a quiet corner of the drawing room. He was a blase society man and she a woman full of the joy of living.

"You are either the most insincere woman I have ever met, or your capacity for enjoying life is beyond my comprehension," he was saying.

"What have I been doing that is so unusual?" she asked.

"Well, I have been watching your enthusiasm this week," he said. "Monday night at that wonderful ball I could understand your enjoyment, everybody had a good time, but the following night, all were correspondingly bored at the musical, but I looked at you and you were as radiant as the sun."

"I cannot understand it," he said. "While tonight these dead private theatricals have nearly finished everybody, and yet you are apparently having the time of your life. So it has been the entire week and I cannot understand it."

"I will tell you the secret of it all," she said laughingly, "comparison is the rift in the lute that is making the music mute for you. I never compare one thing with another. I get all the enjoyment there is out of each thing regardless of what went before. Why compare the ball with its brilliant setting and music to the thoroughly satisfactory thing we have had together this evening? A number of things have happened tonight that I would not exchange for a dozen of those balls. There is a kernel of enjoyment in everything, if we look for it. Throw away comparison with other lives and times and you will always find something interesting and worth while."

"But," he said, "I want to enjoy myself without hunting for things. I can see you would need a lot of education along those lines," she said. "My theory is to take life as a course dinner, enjoying each thing by itself. Why say, 'I don't like filet de sole because I prefer the roast,' or, 'the desert is poor because I enjoyed the entree.' I tell you, comparisons spoil much of life in every line. How often some people become discontented with a perfectly good home, because they have compared it with a better one. I apply that line of thought to anything in life. Yes, my friend, don't wonder at my capacity to have a good time, it's simply that I get the best out of every situation. I have not cultivated it, but like Topsy, 'I was born that way.'"

"A pretty happy way," he said thoughtfully. "I think I will try a little dash of that philosophy that can save not only an entire evening, but a life-time from ennui."

RIVER PARK

A meeting of the River Park Civic club was held Tuesday night at the River Park portable school building with an attendance of 175. Shepherd Leffler of the high school gave a short talk on civil government and gave an outline of the series of talks he would give during the winter. William Happ spoke on the Good Will week campaign. E. Harring gave an address on the "World Wide War."

During the business session the various committees gave reports. The committee on park improvements was retained until spring. It was also decided to have special meetings during the winter when they would have a series of talks on the "World Wide War."

Society Women Learn Hair Curling Secret

"If your hair is straight, flat, dull looking, I need not ask if you long to possess perpetually wavy, light, fluffy, glossy tresses," says Gladys Coleman in Society World. "I'll tell you what to do. Tonight, after your hair has had its usual brushing, take a clean tooth brush, dip it in a saucer of pure liquid salerine and run this through the hair from crown to tip."

"When morning dawns and you have roused yourself out of your downy cot you will have a real surprise, quite an agreeable one. Your hair will have a prettier and more natural-looking curl and lustre than it has ever had before—and there will be nothing streaky, sticky, greasy or anything unpleasant about it. If you will get the liquid salerine from your druggist it will require no preparation at all, and four or five ounces will last for months. This is just the finest thing imaginable for the purpose."—Adv.
